

When the buddha spoke of the kinds of thoughts provoking malice and ill will, he ended with the reflection, “What good will it do to hold on to malice, anger, or resentment?” When these states are predominant in the mind, we can remind ourselves of this question and realize that we’re the ones who are suffering.

From “Mindfulness” by Joseph Goldstein, p. 137